Follow busy mom Katie as she tries to lose weight. Don't miss her weigh-in and her ups and downs after Ellie Krieger's 12-week plan, small changes, big results. In our house we love to watch movies in the den. On a family movie night with Matthew, we could eat dinner while we watch. Or we'll just snuggle up on the couch with some munchies nearby. We are currently going through the entire James Bond catalog, starting from the beginning. (Am I a good mom or what?) At this point in our journey, Sean Connery is still playing Bond, so we have a long way to go ahead of us. When it comes to movie-night snacks in our home, it's not so much the shocked, not stirred that comes to mind. It's more like what do you want from pizza, Matt? We were getting takeaways from a wonderful Italian restaurant that makes the best bread with garlic butter. The problem is when you're busy watching James get himself out of one marinade after another, it's easy to lose count of how many pieces of bread you dunked in butter... So I try to use Ellie Krieger's usual, sometimes, rare tips, so I'll choose movie-night dinners and treats that I won't regret coming weighing in the day. The same restaurant that makes all that delicious bread and butter also makes an average sliced salad. (And I suppose I could ask him without cheese and salami...) Sliced salad, one piece of bread - skip the butter dunking - and a small glass of red wine make a lovely dinner. What if I were tempted to steal Matt's pizza? One envious look at these slender Bond girls should keep me in line. What are your favorite movie-night? Popcorn? Pizza? What do you do to make your movie treats a little healthier? However, this pucky story of dying office worker Don Celso (Sergio Hernandez) may not serve as the best epitaph of the last film for the director. He may not have the scope of his intercontinental soap opera, The Secrets of Lisbon (2010), the depth of his Proust adaptation, Time Restored (1999), or simply the batshit pulp madness of genealogy crime (1997). But this surreal, sentimental journey really provides an excellent all that Ruiz did best: the oddball takes on the highbrow lit and lowbrow genre conventions, tours of maze characters like memory banks, and reveling movie culture that like a wet cinephile dream. Ping pong between the elderly Celso rhapsodizing about the past with a French writer-cum-poetry-teacher (Christian Vadim) and his younger self (Figueroa) outsourcing these scenarios, Night manages to incorporate a multitude of fringe elements into his phantasmagoric landscape. Beethoven and Long John Silver make extended cameos; The botched murder subplot lends an aura to the B-movie threat, while elsewhere, normal conversations suddenly dovetail into Bunuel's weirdness. But the way Ruiz uses such giddy flourishes in the name of looking back on his life is both thrillingly irreverent and remarkably touching. By the time the characters shuffle into the sunset through a giant gun barrel (just go with it), you'll feel a tremendous sense of loss- for old Hernandez saying goodbye to the world, and for practicing a personal, expressionist foreign film auteurism that went softly into the night. Has anyone done any research connecting the culture? Why do we do what we do? Why do women complain so much about all this, and some men are so gung-ho? Random sex in our genes? Why do some people love it there, and some pretty angsty about one night worth it? It turns out these questions and more were asked by the researchers, and some rather intriguing results were discovered. Basically, if you are in search of strange facts about one night's worth, they are there and they are numerous. For example, 70 percent of Americans have had casual sex with someone only once. That's a lot. Casual sex there will be had and it has become less normal if you haven't had such an experience at the moment. Also, there is a lower chance that you will have an orgasm if you engage in casual sex (not surprisingly), but you can get a little boost in self-confidence from it. And you definitely don't have to be romantic or get super in foreplay during a one-night stand if you don't feel like it. What about the strange facts about the night stands? Here are six you should know:1. There's 'Hookup Gene' Some people are born with a predetermined interest in one night stands. The study, led by Justin Garcia of New York State University in Binghamton, found that his DNA comes into play in relation to casual sex (and deception). According to WebMD, a study published in PLoS One concluded that human brain chemistry whether someone is down for casual sex (and other sensation looking for behavior) or not. No. found that those with the DRD4 gene associated with behaviors that make you feel good (often for a short period of time, like doing drugs), are way more likely to have a one-night stand than those who don't have it. Other factors come into play too, of course, and those without it can still be down for sex with a stranger - just not that often. Women care more about hotness than men DoThe level of perceived attractiveness has much more to do with whether a woman decides to go home with a man than vice versa. According to YourTango, the study, led by Dr. Achim Schitzwohl of Brunel University in the UK (published in the journal Human Nature), found that when men and women were given three possible options - come out, go to bed - they were much more likely to accept offers of beds and abodes when they rated men as exceptionally attractive. Men, however, tend to be down to connect regardless of a woman's attractiveness. Often women feel used after a one-night StandOne study for one night stands found that women are much more likely to feel humiliated or degraded after a one-time fling. Of all the survey participants, only 54 percent of women said they had positive feelings about their one-day stand experiences. Men? A staggering 80 percent. Psychologist Anne Campbell, from Durham University in England, found that women's feedback on such experiences included feelings such as I felt cheap and I felt humiliated. Made myself look cheap and easy. Total regret. Men's choices included things like, I think night stands are a good way of blowing out steam, or using words like euphoria and excitement to describe your experience.4 Women Might Jump Into Bed Because EvolutionTodd Shackelford, an evolutionary psychologist at Florida Atlantic University, notes that one night's worth of risks is potentially greater for women. But like Live Science Reports, promiscuity offers natural benefits to women from an evolutionary perspective, according to Shackelford. Thus, women who take part in one night stands, even if they feel terrible after may just be responding to internal, evolutionary urges. If you feel the need to beat yourself up after one night, don't: It was just your biology getting in the way. Flings give women the potential to snag the best genes for offspring, says LiveScience, or they may be caused by a chemical push at the peak of the menstrual cycle. Well, that explains it.5 Hips Don't LieWide hips can be an indicator of addiction to one night's worth. Or so found a British study, evolution and human behavior. According to the Huffington Post, researchers led by Dr. Colin A. Hendry, an associate professor of human and animal ethics at the University of Leeds, asked 148 women between the ages of 18 and 26 to report their hip circumference and sexual history. Researchers found that With wider hips reported a higher frequency of casual sex, although some holes were poked in this study, so TBD on whether this is a legitimate science or not. This was in a study that tried to figure out how people rate the chances of someone having a one-night stand, and found that men who look particularly masculine and women who look particularly feminine are less likely to be perceived as being on the prowl for an exclusive relationship.6 Depression and casual sex are linked According to researchers from Ohio, people who are depressed or suicidal, as teens are more likely to engage in casual sex as adults. The study, published in the journal Sex, looked at the sexual behavior and mental health of 10,000 people and concluded that one night's worth and poor mental health are definitely linked, and strengthen each other.
