Written by Timothy Sexton I was the first person to drive convertible on my booking. The narrator of the opening line offers some very important information. This story is supposed to be about Native Americans - a little later known precisely as members of the Chippewa tribe - and the reason is likely to be for why the conversion is so important that it deserves the title of the story. Of course, some very important information remains: is the narrator male or female? What about their age? Tension suggests that the story will be reminiscence, but to what extent things have happened in the past. I've always wondered how long beautiful hair feels, Henry is the narrator's older half-brother. As his brother observes, built like a brick outside the house, the car gives the narrator the freedom to leave the reservation and explore the surrounding area with his brother as a constant companion. One summer they pick up hitchhiker and drive him all the way back to his home in Alaska. When they first met him, he put his hair on a bread, but then later numbed both brothers by slipping it loose and revealing that so long it almost touched the ground. Henry's response is telling because at this stage of the story, he is loose, playful and with a sense of ease about himself suggesting that he is not dependent on his size and tolerance and allows him to even tease about gender roles. It was a fact: Henry was jumpy and mean. The narrator ended that summer as the brothers arrived home just in time for Henry to get his draft notice. The soldier returning from Vietnam is not the carefree boy who left. Henry is quiet, Edgy, and teasing is a thing of the past. He is also displaying PTSD textbook marks. The younger brother realizes that something needs to be done or that his older brother will stay that way forever. Before he knew that more than six words would come together, I went out to the narrator of his sketch featuring making the popular convertible run so bad that Henry finally had an interest in something that would snap him out of his funk. Ultimately, the design works, but first henry goes crazy about the mode in which the car was allowed to reach it. After an angry outburst is henry that the narrator realizes everything works as planned. My boots are filling artistically with these proxical words of simple observation reaching its hard peak, saying that with a normal voice, it's like he just found out, but the situation is anything but normal, and the story ends with a lot of ambiguity about whether he actually just noticed the conditions of his boots or whether he planned for it. Citing this page, the brothers' relationship usually lasts forever, but in Louise Erdrich's short story Red Convertible, the relationship between the main characters Lyman and Henry takes turns. Erdrich takes his audience through the experiences these brothers encounter and how they should come to terms with which their relationship has changed. Knowing that it will most likely never be the same will be both Lyman and Henry trying to fix their relationship until eventually one falls because of the experiences he faced in life. While Lyman may think turning red will save his and Henry's relationship, Erdrich makes it clear that it's through the characterisation of the brothers, the plot of the story, and the symbolism he uses to tell his story. In... Show more content... Lyman explains, when he came home, though, Henry was very different, and I say this: change wasn't good (Erdrich 129). The change henry is going through is not for the better, the war made him vulnerable and he played through his experiences over and over again. It can be seen that the change was not good for him or Lyman as Lyman was also impressed. Looking at the plot of the story, one can see that the story deals with a psychological conflict. Before Henry had made his way to the Vietnam War he and Lyman had a close relationship and changed significantly since his return because of what he saw and experienced. Lyman explains, when I was in the room watching TV with Henry and I heard his teeth click on something. I looked there and he was bitten by his lip, blood was going down his chin (Erdrich 129). This example shows how Henry deals with post-war stress and how he can't get what went through his head. As he sits down and watches replay war videos, he is unable to get past being able to live again and go back to the way everything was because psychologically he is still at war and fighting. In addition, there is another major focus on the plot to show what will eventually happen to Lyman and Henry when the reader gets to the end of the story. Erdrich foreshadows what event will take place and separate these two brothers forever, right in the beginning of When you leave cleared land, when you step from some place carved out, plowed, or traced by a human and pass into the woods, you must leave something of yourself behind. This is a sudden loss, I think, even more than difficulty walking through low growth, which keeps people firmly into steady paths. There is no right way to go in the forest, of course there is no sequence to follow except the law of growth. You have to go through the thought that everything is right. just look around you . Here's the way things go. Twisted, fallen, separated from the root. What grows best So at the expense of what is below. White birch feeds on the dough of an old hemlock and supports grapes that will slowly tarnish it. In the dead wood another tree blacks the mushrooms as devil's hooves. Canop overhead, tall pine that whistles and trembles and chokes light from their lower branches. It's getting dark, and I know he didn't swim there, but he got it too far. I can hear him, very clearly on the other side of him saying, My boots are filling up. He says it in a normal voice, as if he just found out and doesn't know what to think about it. So he's gone to a branch. A crazy branch. And I'm going in... Back to the car, I turn on the long beams and climb the bank. I put it in first gear and then I clutched my leg out. I want to go out, close the door and see the plow softly in the water. after the splash , theres no sound coming from the river , so im running right now .
